Increased sustainability contributes to development

An increased focus on sustainability may contribute positively to the development of more modern healthcare industry. Sustainable medicine, with reduced carbon emissions and increased use of recyclable materials in healthcare environments, is expected to become increasingly very important and provide a competitive advantage.

We at KEMCO considers it vital for the healthcare industry and for society to understand where medical care is heading and its trends and development prospects. Society should acknowledge and more accurately predict the capabilities and resources required for implementing new approaches to providing all kinds of medical care. KEMCO believes that the industry's main stakeholders, such as doctors, nurses, patients and policymakers, as well as supplier companies, and of course insurance companies, will create a demand for these contentious improving results.
